Pride & Poo

a film by Bradley Silvius

Logline

Robert was on top of the world. Then he met a little ant and an angry bird.

Synopsis

A prestigious award, gorgeous weather, and an ice cold beverage. Robert was having the perfect day. But there's nothing like a pesky ant to ruin the mood. Throw in a bird set on revenge, and things are about to get deadly.

Director's Statement

There's an old saying with various versions, but in its basic form reads: "Pride goes before the fall."

We often think much too highly of ourselves with little consideration of how seemingly insignificant items, ranging from a brake-line fitting in our car to a microbe on the lettuce in our salad, can drastically cripple the very things that prop up our own self-perception.

In "Pride & Poo," I wanted to take a character with a grandiose ego reveling in the throes of an important accolade, and within just a few moments, see him completely debased by a couple of unlikely and seemingly insignificant creatures: an ant and a bird. To provide some backdrop, irony and purpose, the denouement reveals that the bird is the very creature whose demise resulted in the character's accolade.

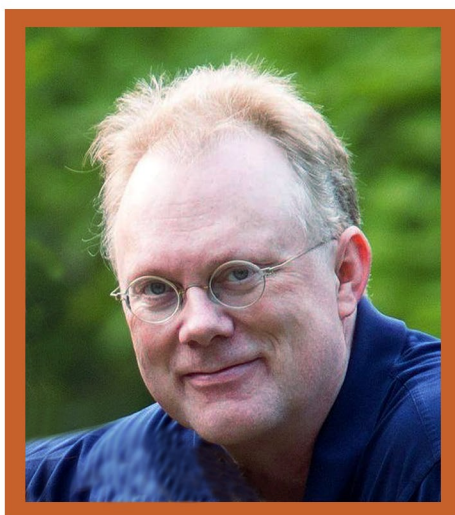

Bradley Silvius Writer/Director
